Workshop 4: Consequences of REACH for environmental licensing.

Statement 1

The information generated in the framework of REACH is far too much and complicated for local authorities to deal with in environmental licensing

Statement 2

For the environmental licensing local authorities can demand more far-reaching obligations than REACH if the specific situation makes this necessary.

Statement 3

Local authorities are not obliged to control whether activities described in the application of a permit are in line with restrictions, authorisations or risk reduction measures prescribed under REACH.

Statement 4

Local authorities should refuse an environmental permit if a company is not able to provide enough information on the substances he is using and emitting. This should even be the case in the situation that the information is not available due to the transitional period of eleven years.

Statement 5

Local authorities should incorporate extra severe demands in environmental permits for substances which are placed in the candidate list for authorisation
